

East Church – 3 August 2010

Archaeology Report available

For those of you who have found the archaeological work at the East Church as fascinating as we have, you'll be pleased to hear that the full report is now available to download from the East Church website - www.eastchurchcromarty.co.uk

The archaeological report covers all the work done inside the church plus all the observations of the church made when the outside drain was replaced and the cement harling removed from the walls.

The work was carried out by Highland Archaeology Services in freezing cold conditions during the winter of 2008. Brendan Malone (above) did most of the excavation work inside the church. In the report you'll find beautifully detailed diagrams of the archaeological features, which he did in conditions that seemed too cold to hold a pencil in, let alone produce such precise work.

Brendan's wife Emma did a similarly detailed drawing of the carved alter kerb stone (above), found in the East Aisle and thought to be the step up to the pre-reformation catholic altar.
